Security Vetting

Due to the confidential and often sensitive nature of the work performed at the CCC, it is imperative every reasonable precaution is taken to protect our people and our information. As part of our recruitment process, we conduct a security vetting process to assess whether a candidate's trustworthiness, discretion, reliability and good character are sufficient to be appointed to a role at the CCC and hold a security clearance. This normally occurs after the interview assessment and if it applies to you, you will receive specific instructions from the panel.

A range of assessments are done depending on your personal circumstances, but as part of the process we seek to:

- Ascertain your identity to verify that you are who you say you are.
- Verify your background to check that the information you have provided through your application is accurate.
- Make a judgement about your character including police, financial and other government system checks, interviewing your referees and assessing your background.
- Verify your financial situation to ensure you are living within your means and are therefore not unduly exposed to a potential conflict of interest.

In undertaking the security vetting process, you will be required to provide statutory declarations and supporting documents. In-depth personal and financial information is required to be supplied in relation to you and your family.

The security vetting process can take time to complete depending on the complexity of your circumstances, but we will endeavour to keep you informed of progress where we can.
